These policy objectives include:

(1) The use of funds for single-family and multifamily housing;
(2) The use of funds for new construction, rehabilitation, including refinancing of existing debt, and home purchases;
(3) The housing needs of low-income and moderate-income persons and families, and of elderly or mentally or physically handicapped persons;
(4) The use of funds in coordination with federal, state, and local housing programs for low-income persons;
(5) The use of funds in urban, rural, suburban, and special areas of the state;
(6) The use of financing assistance to stabilize and upgrade declining urban neighborhoods;
(7) The use of financing assistance for economically depressed areas, areas of minority concentration, reservations, and in mortgage-deficient areas;
(8) The geographical distribution of bond proceeds so that the benefits of the housing programs provided under this chapter will be available to address demand on a fair basis throughout the state;

Ms. Vatske stated in January 2019, the Washington State Legislature’s Joint Legislative Audit and Review Committee (JLARC) finalized its report, Analyzing Development Costs for Low-Income Housing, which studied the costs of developing low-income housing using the Low-Income Housing Tax Credit (LIHTC), managed by the Washington State Housing Finance Commission, and the state’s Housing Trust Fund, managed by the Department of Commerce.

JLARC made three recommendations. One of these was that the Housing Finance Commission identify and evaluate options for increasing the involvement of for-profit developers in the 9% Low Income Housing Tax Credit program and report the findings to the Legislature.

The Commission examined all housing projects allocated tax credits in the state between 2013 and 2019, a total of 28,914 units of housing. Staff also conducted a survey of 77 developers, both for-profit and non-profit, who currently use the program or have in the past. As detailed in the report, staff studied developer relationships, the point-scoring system of the LIHTC competition, relationships and leverage between public funders (particularly the state Housing Trust Fund), and the program’s outcomes.

Based on this evaluation, the Commission staff found that:
1. For-profit developers continue to be important partners in the Low-Income Housing Tax Credit (LIHTC) program, producing thousands of affordable apartments each year using the shallower subsidy, the 4% LIHTC program. Because of the nature of the housing for-profit developers choose to build—and it is important to note that, by definition, they have the freedom to build only housing that will yield a profit—they are able to take advantage of many cost-saving factors identified by JLARC. These include larger size, less expensive locations, and higher-income residents whose rents can support long-term loans and operations. This production of “workforce housing” is of unquestionable value to Washington state.

2. Policy priorities that favor housing for the lowest income and most vulnerable—not developer type—drive the higher costs of production in the deeper-subsidy part of the LIHTC program. Highly competitive because of its deeper subsidy, the 9% program is critical to developing homes for the people of the state with the highest needs. This in turn drives the type of housing built, which tends to be of smaller size, in central metro locations, and for the lowest-income residents whose rents contribute far less to ongoing operations—factors associated with higher costs, per the JLARC report.

3. This focus on residents with the highest needs is the primary reason that for-profit developers choose not to compete for the 9% tax credit, though many partner with nonprofits, as our evaluation shows. It is difficult to make this type of housing profitable, which better explains the absence of for-profit developers than the point system or other factors in the competition. By contrast, it is the mission of many nonprofits and housing authorities to serve those who are homeless and low-income.

4. It is important that the 9% program continues to be prioritized for the lowest income and most vulnerable. This priority is enacted in the federal requirements (Section 42) that govern the LIHTC program, which require each state to ensure that the LIHTC “serve the lowest-income tenants for the longest period of time.” Furthermore, the 9% housing credit is the largest public source of funding for housing for those with the lowest incomes, and a key factor in making these developments financially feasible. It is therefore a critical source of leverage for other public investments—including the state Housing Trust Fund, local housing levies, and federal programs—that alone would be far less cost effective. To de-prioritize the use of this program for the highest needs would be to deliberately set aside our state’s most useful tool in building homes for the homeless and other vulnerable populations.

5. Cost efficiency and good stewardship of housing dollars is of equal importance. Staff remain committed to learning from cost studies such as JLARC and from for-profit partners as the Commission strives to make the most of our financial housing resources. During the past year, the Commission has made several changes to the LIHTC competitive allocation rounds, increasing the emphasis on cost efficiency by increasing the points that projects can earn in this category. We are also considering other changes to our point system that may remove barriers to for-profit participation in the 9% program, as long as we can do so without sacrificing the focus on serving the lowest incomes and highest needs.

Ms. Vatske asked the Commission to consider and act upon the proposed JLARC report.

Mr. Krueger moved to approve the report. Ms. Topper seconded the motion. The report was unanimously approved.
